This article shows that peripheral inoculation (intraperitoneal and subcutaneous injections) of spiroplasma into the rat results in localization of the infection to the brain and spinal cord. This neurotropism is likely related to these bacteria having a preference for consumption of brain lipids.